It's a grand concept to capture reality and make it look like a painting. Successful photographers do this not by adding more Photoshop to an image, but by expressing their artistry and creativity beyond the inherent limitations of the medium. Photoshop doesn't tell artists how to change the pixels. It can teach users to manipulate the canvas, but altering the pixels should be you. Your camera is your most basic creative tool... surprisingly, what you capture on film or digitally impacts your digital editing process more than you might assume. In this session, we'll use Adobe Camera Raw effects and adjustments as a template for recreating film or digital artistry and creativity. You'll experience how to use two similar but distinct applications—Photoshop and Lightroom—together to give an image that extra push needed to capture what is unique and authentic about your subject and your vision. You can use your camera to capture moments that are special and create an image that your viewers will love. I liken it to the taste of food, where every meal has a combination of different flavors—a chocolate soufflé versus a steak tartare. One of the best things about Lightroom is that it helps amateurs and professionals alike get into the act. Getting an image just right the first time is more important than being able to apply a single filter or adjustment after the fact. Lightroom has more automated ways to make the most of your images and you have more control over the editing process. With Lightroom, you can improve aesthetics, reshape the frame, and maintain custom workflow by extending the software in highly flexible and undemanding ways...
