I'm aware of the changes taking place in the ways the program itself is marketed, which I appreciate, even though the changes probably won't affect the average end user citing that they aren't selling software. Of course, this further drives the cost into the programs via the cloud. As with any software that isn't going to change in any meaningful ways, I do hope you like it. And if you do, make sure you link it to Dropbox or something else online, or, when you move to a new Mac, it won't work as it did with your previous system. Heck, even now, MacBooks with 32 GB of RAM will have issues with Photoshop. You get the idea. All of this is done for your digital security. Adobe Cloud is interesting because it's really its own category of software, but it's also an example of how computers are now an integral part of our life. The real issue is that not enough people realize that this is the case, and have a reason to make sure they have a place for their digital life. If you've got all the stuff you need, the cost to set it up and maintain it is only going to increase. This isn't about making a business out of this software, it's about learning to live in a modern world.

Pros: The pros are definitely in the Photoshop line. For starters, it's not Windows-only anymore. It's taken a huge step forward, and if you're part of the Mac community, you're going to feel the change. Its power and its features are such that there are endless things you can do with it. There are numerous tutorials online that teach you hundreds of difficult techniques. It has no limitations in its features that you can define or design as you wish. You can even change the look of a picture in post-processing. This allows a pretty good degree of customization of your photos. The key thing is that, like any other tool, this is just a tool. What it does, it does amazingly well. It has a very user-friendly GUI as well, though certainly not as slick as the Windows application. The few quirks in its interface are minor and will not deter even those who are not technologically-minded. In their own words, Photoshop grew by necessity.

The pixels in an image will be represented by the color values of your image. So, if you add the Red color channel to a picture, the Red channel controls the brightness and the Green channel controls the color. The other two color channels are the Blue color channel and the Yellow color channel. Your goal for the RGB (Red, Green, Blue) or CMYK (Cyan, Magenta, Yellow, Black) channels is to add the blue and yellow component colors to the red component color. Red is the main color of the image, so darkening the red color will decrease the brightness, and decreasing an image's brightness will increase the image's contrast, or luminosity . This is also the key to changing the color of your image: In order to change its color, you will add a color channel to the image. Don't worry—the color of the image will not change! If you are familiar with Photoshop and want to see what happens to your image when you add a color, you should click on the Preserve Luminosity button to force Photoshop to destroy the original image and produce a modified version of the image.
